NEM7 is an essential transmembrane protein that resides in the inner face of the mitochondrial inner membrane. Previously, we reported that the cytosolic domain of NEM7 is required for its mitochondrial targeting. However, a significant fraction of the proteins processed by the mitochondrial targeting signal (MTS) of NEM7 are retained within the mitochondrial matrix and imported into the mitochondria as a single species. In this study, we found that the D56N or the L66S mutation within the MTS resulted in a substantial loss of the capacity of the mutant NEM7 to be imported into the mitochondria. We also found that the D56N mutant of NEM7 had the same interaction with importin-beta as the wild type and that the N-terminal amino acid of NEM7 is not essential for its interaction with the importin-beta. By measuring the K(m) for the binding of importin-beta to the NEM7 mutants in a cell-free import assay, the dominant-negative effect of the D56N mutation was found to be attributable to the impaired interaction of the mutant NEM7 with importin-beta. These results suggest that the impaired mitochondrial targeting of the D56N mutant of NEM7 cannot be attributed to the lack of the MTS.x0 C. for a period of at least 10 hours to yield a particular product.
