The name of the XAML file should instead be what is in the clipboard. I should not have to right-click on the XAML file to "Customize XAML Schema". In addition, I should not have to press Ok to save the schema because I am certain that I do not want to use the schema. I should not have to manually show "Developer Tools" to have the "Use XAML Document Outline" option available. It is much too easy to change the schema name if the XML editor shows the schema name instead of the title of the XML file (the title of the XML file is always changed when the user changes the schema name). The schema name shows the name of the schema (and an extension) in the tooltip. This doesn't make sense to me. XML editor should always be visible by default (not just for XAML). The XML format editor is the same on both of my systems (and I expect that many other users will be using VS 2019 on the same hardware, and not a separate hardware system). The XML editor should have a visual style button (like in the XAML editor) to bring up the XML format editor. The XML format editor should use the XAML page style (system wide). The editing pane should only have a single column (I only have two columns on both my systems) The editing pane should only show the top part of the XML (not the entire document). The XML editor should align the first line of the document (not the entire document) with the XML file name. The XML editor should have a line numbering button on each line (like in the XAML editor). The XML editor should have a line selection button on each line (like in the XAML editor)
