Discover new freeware and great deals. by Sanjay Sharmapdf PDF.Q: How can I run a script on a remote server that has an npm dependency without the dependency? I have two machines: A client machine on the Internet that has access to other machines on the internet (websites) A server machine that is on the local network The client machine needs to pull down a javascript library from a remote server (a web server) but I don't want the script to know or access the npm dependency. There is no other way to access this library, if I need to. How do I prevent this script from accessing the npm dependency, so that it can successfully run on the remote server? A: Create a new folder on the server machine and there copy the package in that folder on the client machine. In package.json on the server run: { "scripts": { "foo": "npm install --save" } } Then on the client machine just run: foo As this just executes the npm install -s the dependency will be installed on the client machine as well. The npm install --save is important so that
