Visual cortical neurons in behaving animals showed intense spontaneous activity whose frequency responded to tactile stimulation applied at different body locations. The characteristic time course of the response consisted of an acute increase of the activity followed by a slow decay to a slightly elevated level, the magnitude of which depended on stimulus location. The response to tactile stimulation was initiated by the stimulus itself, localizing into a small part of the receptive field. We suggest that this increased activity is due to the activation of circuits via supragranular collaterals arising from the somatosensory cortex. Such an interpretation is consistent with the marked increase in coupling between neurons, revealed by crosscorrelation analysis performed during tactile stimulation.
