The voltage-sensitive phosphatase Cd-VSP is required for maintenance of neuronal polarity and neurite extension. The voltage-sensitive phosphatase Cd-VSP (aka PAG, VSP, or PRAP) has been identified as the neuronal Ca(2+)-dependent phosphatase CSCaMK responsible for the regulation of neuronal polarity and neurite extension. Here we report that loss of Cd-VSP in neurons causes rapid perturbation of the cellular polarity of dendrites and axons. The precise targeting of the enzyme, at the synapses, is established during early stages of development and maintained throughout the life of the neuron, in adult tissues. Interestingly, Cd-VSP appears to stabilize the low surface membrane potential of dendrites. Remarkably, Cd-VSP deficiency causes depolarization of dendritic spines. However, this effect is not necessary for the establishment of synaptic contacts because (1) the number and size of dendritic spines are similar in wild-type and cds-1 mutant animals and (2) overexpression of Cd-VSP prevents spine shrinkage in mutant animals. We also found that Cd-VSP is not expressed in muscle, although one of its close homologues VAP is expressed in this tissue. Based on these observations, we propose that Cd-VSP is the neuronal Ca(2+)-dependent phosphatase responsible for the fast response to neuronal excitation and that it plays a role in the regulation of dendritic membrane potential and possibly in the modulation of synaptic transmission.[Prostatic acid phosphatase in diagnosis of metastatic prostate cancer]. Prostate acid phosphatase is an important tumour marker of prostatic adenocarcinoma. The use of this marker is discussed in patients with prostatic hyperplasia or adenoma, with benign prostatic enlargement or prostatic benign tumours. The results in 50 patients undergoing surgery for prostatic tumours are discussed and a new simplified assay is described. This test is based on the precipitation of prostate acid phosphatase by trinitrophenyl-phosphate (TNP) in the presence of urea. The removal of the urea allows the reaction between prostate acid phosphatase and TNP to take place, and the results appear as a blue-red reaction.
