Texas Revolution The Texas Revolution (of 1836) began in October with an armed conflict between the Democratic Congress of the Republic of Texas and the Texas Provisional Government (predecessor of the Republic of Texas). The fighting was triggered by the actions of the Texian army and the Texas military in the December 1835 Battle of San Jacinto, and ended in February 1836 with the Texas Declaration of Independence. The Texas government and its army fought the United States to defend Texian independence, but also to prevent an American invasion of Texas and to force America to recognize the independence of the Texian republic. The United States was a republican nation, however, and there were those who opposed the fighting on the grounds that Texas was attempting to unilaterally secede from the United States. There were also some who argued that fighting a war of secession was illegal, and a violation of the United States constitution. The early stages of the conflict resemble the American Revolutionary War in that the Texian government's army also consisted of men who were loyal to the United States. The colonial inhabitants of Texas had long been accustomed to a mostly peaceful existence and were armed only when in self defense. The majority of the colonial inhabitants had little inclination to fight their own government, and so the majority of colonists remained neutral during the conflict. The region was inhabited by many Native American tribes; the most powerful in the region was the Tawakoni, a friendly tribe that assisted the Texians. Most Native American tribes would not interfere in the conflict and sought neutrality in the conflict. Several Native American tribes were in conflict with the United States; the Wacos, Peorias, and Yalobis all went to war with
