Now 16, Teddy Clarke can already box and hang on a straddle rope. And he hopes to go for the "bronze" standard at the 2020 Paralympic Games. You are currently viewing Lifestyle news » Clarence J. "Teddy" Clarke Jr. does not consider himself any different from other teen athletes. "I'm one of those people who is passionate about sports, and I don't care what it is," says the 16-year-old sophomore from East St. Louis, Ill. "It's something that gives me a better life and I'm able to do things." Before he tore the muscles in his lungs in a crash, he played Pop Warner football, football, basketball and track for East St. Louis High School. "He has a very competitive spirit," says his mother, Brenda Clarke. She adds that she and her husband Clarence Clarke were worried when they saw a picture of Teddy on a respirator. "When he got out of the hospital and they took him to the back they said you have another chance," she recalls. "They said if we can find a doctor that will take a look at your lung, they can remove the other one." Teddy was born with a condition called pulmonary atresia, which means his two lungs are not connected to his heart. A doctor told Teddy and his mother that he would have to be on a respirator most of his life. "Teddy has no breath and no circulation," Brenda says. She says he started boxing to give him something to do. After three months of training he even won a tournament in a special class for people with disabilities.
